The Daily Quote

"After a brutal year filled with infighting and legislative crises, the Republican majority has a simpler goal for the rest of this year: stay unified and tranquil during a presidential election year and avoid the battles that reveal the divides within their own party...In 2011, Republicans talked about cutting spending, trying to convince the public that doing so would create jobs. That message — along with talk of the size of government — isn't strong, Republicans were told in a polling briefing...The fact that they're coalescing around a fresh set of principles shows that leaders are aware of the discontent in the conference and recognize that a fresh start is necessary to maintain their majority. It's an attempt to scuttle the sense of crisis and improvisation that was the backdrop to governing in 2011."
